Quakefinder

Earthquakes have long been feared as natural disasters that occur with no advance warning. But a different detection methodology is hoping to change that.

Actually making a prediction of a probable earthquake on the way is a risky proposition, admits Tom Bleier (left), the man behind Quakefinder. So he's committed to sharing that information directly and quietly with emergency officials, and will let them determine what, if anything, they want to make public.
